The surveyor came ashore at Harwick in the spring of 1851 and spent the summer measuring the bay from a rowing boat. He worked from first light until the tide turned, writing bearings in a small book that he kept in his coat. In the evenings he drew the chart by lamplight in the room above the harbour office, and the fishermen came to watch.

The surveyor came ashore at Harwick in the spring of 1851 and spent the summer measuring the bay from a rowing boat. He worked from first light until the tide turned, writing bearings in a small book that he kept in his coat. In the evenings he drew the chart by lamplight in the room above the harbour office, and the fishermen came to watch.